ANTICYBERSQUATTING
CONSUMER PROTECTION ACT:
A Legislative History of Public Law No. 106-113
Appendix I, 113 Stat. 1501a-545

Edited by William H. Manz

Many Internet users attempt to visit the homepages of particular authors, organizations, sports leagues, or universities without knowing the homepage's specific domain address. Instead, these people will enter the name of what they are looking for and type ".com" at the end, assuming they will find what they are seeking. Oftentimes, however, they discover that they have been transferred to a completely unrelated site containing slanderous, obscene, or even pornographic content.

This deliberate, bad-faith, and abusive registration of domain names is known as "cybersquatting," and the initial legislation addressing the controversy surrounding this practice is now available in William Manz's work, Anticybersquatting Consumer Protection Act: A Legislative History of Public Law No. 106-113 Appendix I, 113 Stat. 1501a-545.

Manz's compilation reviews the Act designed to deal with this new form of trademark abuse. The law amends the insufficient Trademark Act of 1946 to make liable (in a civil action by the owner of a trademark or service mark) any person who – in an effort to profit from the trademark – registers, traffics in, or uses a domain name which is identical or confusingly similar to a distinctive name.

Key provisions of the Act include:

- * Nine factors courts consider in determining whether intent is in "bad faith"
- * Limitation of liability for the actionable use of a domain name to the registrant or the registrant's authorized licensee only
- * Specific ways in which domain name registrants may shield themselves from liability

This set provides a truly comprehensive look at this groundbreaking and controversial Act and is an essential component to the trademark collections of law libraries and legal researchers alike.
