Legal Information Review

Editor-in-Chief: Susan Nevelow Mart

Editors: Paul Callister, Benjamin Keele, Dennis C. Kim-Prieto, Jonathan A. Franklin, Lee Peoples, Shawn G. Nevers, Janet Sinder, Victoria J. Szymczak & Ronald E. Wheeler

The intersection of law, librarianship, and legal research.

The Legal Information Review (LIR) is a journal like no other. This annual journal available in print and online fills a void in the publishing venues available for law librarians and legal information professionals on two levels: LIR uses a blind, peer-review process to approve or reject articles, and the journal welcomes unconventional writing.

LIR's scope is consistent with the broadest definition of legal informatics, before that term was co-opted by the data analytics crowd. The Legal Information Review encourages submissions of applied or theoretical work on the intersection of law, librarianship, and legal information, including:

- The theoretical framework for teaching legal research (issues such as information literacy theory, adult learning theory, network theory, or other educational, social science, or psychology theories)
- Information retrieval (both manual and automated systems such as artificial intelligence and law)
- Law and policy (issues such as privacy, copyright, and security)
- Information access issues (such as making legal and government information more accessible to the public, both physically and intellectually)
- Practice issues (analyses or applications which help lawyers in their day-to-day operations)

The philosophy behind this journal is that law librarians and legal information professionals need more outlets for scholarship and scholarly conversations, rather than fewer. At a time when the world of law is in flux and the role of law librarians is being hotly debated, the more fora available to illustrate the scope of our thought, the better. Whether working in law firms, corporate offices, law schools, government libraries, or for start-ups or vendors, the glow from good writing, new ideas, and new paths we discover to support our constituencies and prove our worth illuminates all of us. Writing is still an important way to carry on the conversations that need to be had. Everyone who has an interest is encouraged to join the conversation, as writers and readers.

How to Submit an Article

Legal Information Review encourages manuscripts with links to author-produced videos, PowerPoints, or other media. Articles will be available in both online and print versions. The first volume is dated 2015–16.

Submissions can be sent electronically to susan.nevelow.mart@colorado.edu or susan.mart@colorado.edu. For information on how to format your paper for blind peer review and to see all of the submission policies for Legal Information Review, go to www.wiselawlibrary.org/LIR/.
